The adventure on the post modernity: the endless gift of pleasure

"Today the time flies, slides on the hands, even if we don’t feel, and there is no time that may come back, love. Let’s enjoy whatever we have to live, let permit ourselves" by Lulu Santos

According to this song the composer expresses an urgent feeling toward life. Time seems to be flying, accelerated, "sliding by the hands", and it is necessary to live intensively. It suggests that we should permit ourselves the precious moments of our lives.

And based on this feeling of human dignity, that there is a fate which conducts to a sort of tragic sense of existence, which Maffesoli (2001) tells us, exactly about the post modernity nature. This sense is expressed by the author as a survival of a life full of risks and ephemeral situations. We were born at this world and we should take the most of it, intensively.

The adventure is presented when living "the present moment", the sense of living the maximum the present moment. To live the present is a way of eternity. The author comments that living the life as an adventure, the human being overcomes his own crisis of identity imposed by modern utilitarian ideology.

At the present moment, is installed all the strength and its emotions. To the adventurous man, that live in the post modernity, the present moment is the one which has a transcendental value in his life. This time is not determined for any past element, and its life has no relation to the future. Only the actions that will conduct the human being to the encounter of his adventure experience and these actions have the real sense of the adventure at that instance.

In these contemporary circumstances it is possible to have a nomad figure, witness of a tragic fate that will have to follow. A destiny which conduct him to a tragic sentiment of existence. A daily life full of routines and adventures but at the same time, vulgar and intense. At this point, consists the origin of the tragic: "nothing will be guaranteed, and, however, in the objective cases, routine rituals happenings may appear from unforeseeable consequences" (p. 116).

When the casualty makes part of the scene, the tragic begins: impenetrability of people, of relations, of things. That is the sense of life as an adventure.

For Maffesoli (2001) a “what is important in the intensity of the moment is the persecution of pleasure by the pleasure. The search of pleasure that is depleted on its act, is not projected to the future anymore. This care of the “good moments” is not oriented anyway in a sense of a finally to be reached” (p. 121).

The playful errant, the pleasure of living, the acceptance of existence, making the flowing of the good feelings, words is the “act of getting out of the way”, without being worried with its utility.

FROM THE MEDIEVAL TO THE POST MODERNITY

Maffesoli (2001 a) believes that there are no abrupt beginnings and ends to the beginning of modernity and also for the end post medieval. So, the medieval post modernity arrived and it was called modernity. At this sense, the new state was characterized of post modernity. The author gives a provisory definition of post modernity which could be the cooperation of archaic phenomenon and of the technological development” (p. 20). With this position Maffesoli says that this can be the “spiral” which is formed in the post modern era.

Rouanet and Maffesoli (1994) comment that exist many versions to the beginning of modernism. Many authors believe that modernism began with both rebellions, because of the revolutions, the English Industrial Revolution and the French Politics at the end of the XVIII century.

There are two opinions among the intellectuals about the modernism and the post modernism. The first says that the historic moment presents a qualitative “mutation” in relation to the recent past; the second one says that would be only a deep study of tendencies that have already started “inside” and “belonged” to the modernity.

Maffesoli believes that the modernity has its particularities about the post modernity for how the daily routine that was so ignored previously, became so important, and is based in this context, where the routine topic brings its contribution to the comprehension of the post modernity society. The author shows the short line existent between the daily routine sociability and the post modernity. To Maffesoli (2001a), the daily routine must be understood as an ‘alchemist laboratory’ of minuscule creations that determine the daily routine, as a place of re-creation of itself and the maintenance of identity which permits the resistance.

Following this same idea, the author comments that it is on the space of the daily routine where is practiced a ‘parallel sociability’, an underground sociability (p. 18).

During modernity, the individual should be one, with life and actions following and identity of logic. However, at the post modernity, there is an ambivalence between the fact of “want to be here and there”, and the desire of dissatisfaction, the constant dilemma between the static and dynamism.

At the moment at these changing, Maffesoli (2001 b) tells us that there is a kind of contemporary paradox toward globalization, of the technological development, of a society that want to be positive and affirms itself perfect, but express it on the search and necessity of the ‘empty’, the immaterial, of what there is no price, that can not have a bill to pay. This is the paradox of the world acceptance and it is the refuse of established values.

Facing an apparent unified world, a rational civilization, the instrumentalized powers, and the established thoughts have a huge difficult to comprehend the daily routine in the life of the common human being.

It is the deal where is installed the rupture of the individualism to the pluralism. It is the time of tribalism. In the tribes, the individual meets signs of social knowledge; in the ways of life, in favorite music, clothing uniforms, language, slang, corporal activities. To the author, the tribalism is the constant ups and downs that establish between the crescent influence and the development of mini groups. It transcends frontiers and makes clear a common testimony. It is structured from a sentiment of help among people and an affectionate environment. It is a kind of tension that seems to characterize the sociability since the end of the century.

We may say that the identities become weaker and the person turns to profile different roles at the tribes which they become involved. It means that one surrenders to the other. Each one just exists by the eye of the other. And this, either he is the other one from the tribe or the alienation of nature or the “other big one”- which is Divine (p. 27).

Following the author’s ideas, we may notice, nowadays of post modernity, the renascence of ‘the other place’, a sort of “thirsty of the infinitive”. It is delimited the errant of the imaginary, where life is lived as a sense of an eternal new beginning: the same life and over again, old and actual.

It is a period of transition marked by the strong dilemma/tribe. Maffesoli (2004), comments that places produce a bond of union. Thus link is based on the common possession of old values; costumes, language, corporal activities, food.
To the author, the megalopolis are formed by various big “altars”, emblematic ones where are celebrated cults of strong component aesthetic and ethico-body sculptures, of sport, of image, of sex. The common sense is the place where the cults are performed. The space for celebration. In this perspective, the place is the link.

In these altars, the daily life banality gets directly strength or by means of television. They are places where people meet themselves, know each other, and doing this, know them own selves. The celebration can be cultural, consumption, musical, playful (i.e. parc dés Princé, Roland-Garros), religious (Notre-Dame, intellectual).

There are some “small altars” of the daily routine which have the same function: They create the “mysteries of the communion communication” (2004). We notice that the spaces where the outdoors sports are practiced can be considered the “small altars”, where the athlete considers the place as a recognition of himself.

METHODOLOGICAL STRATEGIES

The qualitative nature study has the aim to certify the senses of adventure, nomadism, errant, tribalism and the place at the altar. In our instance, they are part of the athlete pleasure of free flying, skate street, tracking, mountaineering, climbing, free fall and rafting. The research was defined after thesis studies of Doctorate by Vera L. Costa (1999). Mountaineering: Katia Passos (2005), Tracking, Master’s essays by: Luciana Abdala (2001); Free flying: Manuela Gonsales (2004); Free fall: Fabiana Rodrigues (2004), Rafting: Maria Regina Costa (2004), Skate street.

It was adopted as methodological strategies a meta-analysis, which consists in a technical literature review with a determined by several studies that have already been done, and the analysis of previous studies.

THE STUDY

There were observed in these practices characteristics that Maffesoli says to be from the present days. To exemplify, we may observe the reality presented on the ups the downs established between the union and micro groups development. The use of the metaphor “tribe”, permits us to identify the process of non-individualization and the valorization of each person’s role, who is called to represent inside it.

In these circumstances, there are indications of categories of post modernity in the speeches of the practitioners of sports that use the air, water and the urban area. At this sense, we notice a prevalence in the speeches of the practitioners of the importance of being and have friends that have been the fundamental elements important for the first stage, to know people and climb together a lot of mountains, to be in the middle of friends, to feel fear when going down on a rafting, or even considering that to be together and sharing the maneuvers is always marvelous in the skate street.

These practitioners join groups which are identified socially. They were their playful tribes. So, we may comment that are characteristics of a strong tribalism presented at the free fall, climbing, rafting and skate street.

In another category, it appears in this study, the “nomadism” and the “errand” that are proper at the moment as a desire of breaking with the pre-established and go further to another place else.

It was observed in the speeches of these people the “search for pleasure and freedom”, as is indicated in the speech of a practitioner of free fall, describing the pleasure that they feel when they jump. He affirms that it is not such a crazy act and not a break of the daily routine verified by the practitioners of free flying. Thus, we may also affirm in the speech of a young man that when practicing this sport, it was a way of breaking all the imposed things established by the system to his daily life, going out to new adventures, during his clipping.

To these social characters, there is a break of a paradox of acceptance of pre-established values. This nomad figure is not revealed in sports practiced in water, for instance, at the rafting.

Based on these previous analysis, emerge the sense of “the adventure” as an integral and remarkable essential element of sports practiced at the post modernity. Giving support to the contextualization of the author in relation to the post modernity, we may say that “the adventure” is framed as a present element under consideration in the centralities of the speeches of these characters practitioners of these outdoors/adventure sports.

We also claim the Maffesoli’s ideas, concluding that these practitioners elect their own space to practice them as emblematic ones, where they celebrate ceremonies of high esthetic and ethic component. For them, the common denominator is elaborated inside each space of celebration.

FINAL CONSIDERATION

This study is based in a preliminary analysis in relation to adventure/outdoors sports at the contemporary moment. We may affirm that the remarkable characteristics of post modernity are determined by Michel Maffesoli in his literary composition, as the tribalism, nomadism and errand. The adventure is present in the speeches of the practitioners of the adventure/outdoors sports in nature and in the urban environment.

Abstract: THE ADVENTURE SPORTS AFTER THE POST MODERNISTER ERA AND THE MICHEL MAFFESOLI’S IDEAS

This article comes to grips with Michel Maffesoli’s ideas about the post modernist society and the relation of adventure and risk sports at this moment, where it seems to have had a renaissance of an archetypal structures, archaic ones.
There was a preference of outdoors sports, involving the air, like free flying and free fall. On land, involving mountaineering and tracking. In the water, rafting and also skate street, an adventure sport practiced in urban areas. This study has a qualitative aspect and its aims are: (a) identify the presence of characteristics at the post-modernity on the speeches of the practitioners of adventure and hazard sports in nature and in the urban environment; (b) verify the relations existed on the speeches of these practitioners of these sports that make use of air, land and water. This study is characterized by a meta analyses, beginning by studies interpretations of Katia Passos (2005) Trekking, Manuela Gonzales (2004). Free fall, Fabiana Rodrigues (2004). Rafting, Vera L. Costa (1999), Mountaineering, Maria Regina Costa (2004); Skate Street, Luciana Abdalal (2001). Free flying, and the analyses of the context beginning by the speeches of these practitioners of hazard and adventure sports. In a initial analysis, we verified that the hazard and outdoors sports match with post modernistic characteristic, conforming qualified in previous studies mentioned. They were times of the tribes, of nomadism, errant, sensible reason of adventure. The places make the links. It is noticed that these characteristics emerged from a significant way on the practitioners of risk and outdoors sports.
